first_name [0] = “D” fails because Python strings are immutable, meaning their contents cannot be changed in-place after they are created in memory. Python strictly blocks any direct modification to an existing string's characters.”D” + first_name [1:] succeeds because it does not alter the original string at all. Instead, it uses slicing and concatenation to build a brand new string from scratch and store it in a completely separate location in memory.